Col. Fellows asked for a change of venue in the case of Gleason vs. Anschell. He alleged that there was a defect in Anschell's bail bond. The deputy-sheriff had been held to hall by Justice Kavanagh and Justice Manley had accepted the bond. Justice Manley's signature, newwer, had been omitted.

The informality, Col. Fellows claimed, vituated all former proceedings, and the present continuted Mr. Anschell's first examination, and he demanded a change of venue in order to bring the case properly torward with a view of going to the Suprime Court.

The motion was bitterly opposed by counsel for the Mayor. Justice Kavenagh, however, decided the point taken as to the bail band to be a good one, and ruled as Col. Fellows had night.

The motion for a change of venue was at once renewed, upon which Giesson's lawyers claimed that if this was the first examination it should proceed before Justice Kavanagh.

After long wrangling, Justice kavanagh put the case over till to-morrow, when he will Recorder Smyth in reply said that on the evidence the jury, in his opinion, could have found Frenchy guilty of murder in the first degree. In homicide cases, however, the law permitted the jury to decide the grade of the crime which had been committed, and in finding the prisoner guilty of a lesser degree of crime they had simply exercised a right to which they were chilled.

"I will say this for the jury," said the Becorder, "that they were men of intelligence and integrity, and I believe the jury was perfectly justified in finding a verdict for murder in the second degree.
